THE DRIFT OF THEATRICAL TALK

Capt. Altred Thompson, whose burlesque, "The Crystal Slipper," is about to be produced in Chi-cage, is a little annoyed. "Somebody," he said yesterday, "I don't know who, has credited me cago, running down its society, its people and so on. This, coming at a time when I am about to visit that city and produce my play there, is rather trying, especially as it is eminently untrue. I don't know the very first thing about Chicago society, so I could not have maligned it." Capt. Thompson thinks that "The Crystal Slipper will be a very good thing. It is natural that he should, as he is the author. He says that he has a pleasing contract which in the event of the burlesque's success will bring grist to his mill. "I fared badly with 'The Arabian Nights'," he said, "which ran for 100 nights in Chicago last summer. The re-ceipts were $84,000 and I never got one cent." The cast of "The Crystal Slipper" will be a good one. Edwin Foy, lately of Kate Castleton's com-Delaro, Miss Ida Mulle, Miss Jessie Villars, Mrs. Ruth Stetson, Miss Maud Waldemere, and Miss Ella Bock will have parts. "The Crystal Slipper" will undoubtedly be seen in New York.

Osmond Tearle, Charles Groves, C. Dodsworth, Miss Entd Lestie and Miss Minnie Conway-Tearle sailed for England early this morning on the slow steamer Buffalo. Mr. Tearle's starring season nafning English member of Mr. Abbey's company is Kyrie Beilew, who—by special permission of Mr.
Abbey—is touring the wild West with Mrs. Potter.

On the steamship Buffalo was also Miss Clara Ellison, of Mme, Modjesua's company. Miss Ellion goes over every year on a slow steamer to enjoy "the pure ozone," She says that this time she will probably play in London for a short time before returning. . . .

Democracy will not interfere with " The Streets of New York" at the Academy of Music to-night. On Monday the curtain did not finally descend until midnight. The strong human situations in the play, however, kept the audience deeply interested.

E. E. Rice is talking of taking "The Pearl of Pekin" to Loudon. It will be withdrawn from the Bijon Opera-House June 2, and will then go to Brooklyn for a week.

Messra, C. R. Gardner, E. M. Gardner and Frank W. Holland are very anxious that "The Arabian Nights" company now playing at Poole's Theatre should not be confounded with the original Standard Theatre organization, which they now control.

Joseph Wheelock will play the leading part in 'Among the rines," the new American play by Mr. Wilson, illustrating life in Maine, shortly to be produced at the People's Theatre.

A. J. Schlicht. "Louisville's basso," is to make his first metropolitan appearance at the Fifth Avenue Theatre to-morrow for the benefit of A. S. Phillips's widow.

The Thestre Comique, Harlem, will be closed next Monday night on the occasion of the testi-monial benefit to Lester Wallack at the Metropolitan Opera-House in order that Frank Mayo may appear in the cast. Mr. Mayo thought at first that afternoon and volunteered to appear. When it was that it would conflict with his engagement at the Comique. Mr. Hart personally came to the rescue Mesers. Booth and Barrett appeared in "Maclast night before a large audience. Mr. Booth was Banquo, Laurence Hanley Malcolm and Miss Gertrude Kellogg Lady Macbeth. To-night "Hamlet " will be given.

Miss Kate Claxton's engagement at Nibio's will ast two weeks. "The World Against Her" has evidently made a hit at the Garden.

While Wilson Barrett, Miss Eastlake and the members of Mr Barrett's company are producing "Ben-my-chree" at the Princess Theatre, London, Miss Grace Hawthorne, who has lately been playing in "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab" at that house, will tour the provinces with "Dorothy Grav." " Weakness " and other plays.

Mis: Mamie Cabill, who played in Nat Goodwin's "Little Jack Sheppard" company with Miss Posen" company, has returned to her home in Brooklyn. A number of offers of engagements have been made to her, but it is more than probaable she will remain at home until the fail.

Mr. Arthur Forrest is about to leave for England to produce in London at the Novelty Theatre a play written especially for him by Mr. Frits Cunliffe. Owen, son of Sir Philip Cualiffe-Owen, K. C. B. The play is regarded as being an unusually strong

And then he rushed away, determined to leave her that very night.

It was needless to dwell on the wretchedness he endured. At a hotel on his journey East, he met Sydney Chauncey and his bride Bell Lee, whom Sydney told hum came near being lost to him by Mark's sudden appearance just as he asked the important question

Mark gathered a bunch of violets, and, laying them in her lap, said:

"Lyn, darling, how doubly dear these flowers will ever be to us, for they have brought us together again."

"Yes, I love you again now, little violets, "kissing them as she spoke," and will wear you on my wedding day."

And the old trees waved their assent, and the sunset came and lingered beside them till twilight drove her away; and yet they sat and taked, and felt as if life were all too short to say the many loving words they had for each other.

Stung with remoise, he has ened on to seek them both, and make what reparation was possible. What if Carolyn loved another by this time, or would refuse to see him? But when he found she had gone in the country for a few days, he was encouraged to hope it was on account of the anniversary of the day. So there he found her, weeping and unhappy, and there he left her, smilling and peaceful. It was not hard to forgive him, for he brought her rest, and she had so longed for it.

VIOLETS. BY NATALIE.

AROLYN LEE stood quietly looking out from the tay-window, commanded a pretty view of the country, and the sunbeams shone upon her wavy hair, until it looked almost as golden as themselves, and then themselves, and then played among the themselves, and then played among the beautiful mosses and flowers, with which the window was filled, dancing in little quick. steps before her eyes, as if saying: "Look up, and heart! See how bright and merry we are, and be cheerful, too."

But Mark Beresford understood affairs, only he covered the time and attention that Carolyn bestowed on Chauncey, and gradually the "green-eyed monster" crept into hi heart, and he began to doubt her allegiance to himself.

Thus matters stood, when one day the first violets of the season were amounced, and the whole party proceeded to the woods to search for the sweet little blossoms. They were few and far between as yet, and merry was the strife as to who should gather the largest quantity.

seat for a week, and Mark Beresford was as devoted as any month-old fiance could de-sire. But Tom Chauncey was there, too, looking as miserable as he did when the engagement was first announced.

And her tender heart felt more and more full of pity for poor Tom, who tried in vain to appear unconcerned and light-hearted in the bewitching presence of her who seemed more like an angel than ever, now that she was lost to him. And in mistaken kindness she endeavored to cheer and draw him away from his thoughts. No wonder Tom's eyes were riveted on her whenever he was in sight, or that he was y ted unaccountably stupid by the rest of the girls.

But Mark Beresford understood affairs, only he coveted the time and attention that gagement was first announced.

And her tender heart felt m

The group soon separated in different directions, and Carolyn was left searching alone in one place, when Tom came hastily towards her saying:
"Miss Carolyn, you are in luck if you come with me. I've discovered any quantity growing down by the brook, and came to tell you."

Oh, thank you, Mr. Chauncey! You are my good genius! I have only these few you see," holding them before him, and looking up with her own violet eyes, which thrilled him with happiness whenever he met their soft gaze.

Light as air his heart felt as he drew her arm in his and led her to the violet bank where they found them growing, as he reported, in large quantities.

Ca: olyn was enthusiastic in her admiration of and success in getting them, and they soon had gathered every blossom within sight, chatting merrily all the while.

Then they sat down on the mossy seat arranged within the centre of a group of trees, to wait the coming of the rest.

Carolyn sang. "I know a bank whereon the wild thyme grows." while Tom hummed an accompaniment.

an accompaniment, "What lovely flowers these are!" said

Carolyn, "I declare, I'd like to be a violet myself, just for the sake of being loved by everybody."

"No need of your joining the floral kingdom for that, Miss Lyn," said Tom; "you know your friends and lovers are legion."

"But violets are never injured with praise or admiration like vain mortals, and yield nothing but sweetness to all alike." said Carolyn. "I shall always associate them hereafter with this my first hunt after them in the woods. My early acquaintance with them always begins on the street, where they make their annual debut in the hands of flower-girls, who have me for a daily customer."

flower-girls, who have me for a daily customer."

Thus they sat and chatted, and the moments pass-d swiftly by until the deepening fwlight aroused Carolyn, who wondered where Mark was, that he should leave her so long unsought, and she proposed going to the house without waiting for the party; so they crossed the rustic bridge, and were walking slowly along the path when Carolyn ca ght sight of Mark hurrying through the woods in an opposite direction. She called him, but he did not hear, and she was left to imagine all sorts of reasons for his rather odd behavior.

Carolyn, "I declare, I'd like to be a violet awaiting the arrival of the loiterers, of whom there were two besides Lyn and Tom-her Cousin Bell and Tom's brother Sydney, who stood, on this pleasant spring afternoon, looking out on the scene of her grief, the memory of the past, with its deep, trusting love and sudden disappointment, came rushing over her tunultuously, and flinging a shawl around her, she ran a ross the lawn, shawl around her, she ran across the lawn, down by the brook to the old mosss seat, where he had often speut happy nours with her, and where he first avoided her on that eventful day.

This was such a day as that, bright and balmy—and the air laden with the perfume of violets. But the odor sick ned her now, and she turned away from the sicht of them.

"Poor little violets, how I loved you one year ago, but now you bring nothing but bitter memory to me!" and barying her face in the soft moss, she sobbed out her misery where none could see or hear her.
